Green Revolutionaries Are Pluralists
By Mildred J. Loomis
What's a pluralist? In general, a person who sees many problems of "living" and many answers: one who is not satisfied to concentrate on any single problem or solution. The School of Living is based on pluralism. Its members are concerned with all aspects of living.

Green Revolution readers are pluralists, as their letters and articles show. Your editor enjoys this. I confess, after 25 years in the School of Living, to being constitutionally unable to attach any one aspect of living. Life is just too complex for that.

International Foundation for Independence

Possibly GR's major emphasis is homesteading. But vital as this is, it is only one aspect in a larger framework of creation. If we are seriously working to extend our readership, we have expressed approval, but income has not grown as yet to sustain the extra $140 a month which it costs. I trust readers will be generous and that we can plan and progress.

Search for Inner Growth

Another aspect of life needs attention -- the search for knowledge and understanding. As the above quote suggests, "Everywhere this is on the increase today. Many of our readers share this (see "Excerpts from Seekers for Inner Growth"). People are turning from a former concentration on externals, on what they can buy. This is a swing to a more spiritual emphasis, excluding all but the inner. We tend to hold to pluralism -- that looking inward is part of the whole.

At least half a dozen mothers-to-be have shared their experiences with us. Most of these are interesting. For younger people, or any interested person, they are an excellent place to start.

The revolution needed today is one of education -- teaching the child to develop his mental potential. The child's first teaching is the teaching of living; and living is very complex. If we are going to talk about a revolution to meet the emergency, we must understand the whole of the child's teaching. The child must be taught how to live in the world of today, and tomorrow, and the future. In order to do this, we must understand how the child is living, and how he can be helped to live more fully.
